Jail was no place and in order to secure the condemnation of private property for this purpose. The use to which the property is to be applied must not be a private but a public use. I think it entirely competent to say in this instrument that these particular uses are public. The term public use must have a meaning controlled by the necessity and not that which it generally bears. ing our condition it is safe to say that we are within that principle in adopting this amendment. It has been repeatedly held that you can appeal to the doctrine of eminent domain to protect, drain and render valuable lands which, by the overflow of a river might otherwise be an extensive and worthless swamp. Here thee nditions are changed. We do not seek to drain lands, but by irrigation to flow water upon the surface. By analogy and purity of reasoning the same principle is applicable. In order to protect, reciaim and render valuable our lands, which otherwise would be valueless and a waste, this right must be upheld.
